Marshall M. Fredericks Sculpture Museum

The exhibition Centuries of Progress: America’s World’s Fairs, 1853-1982 will be on display through Friday, April 5 at the Marshall M. Fredericks Sculpture Museum.

The Centuries of Progress exhibition celebrates how these international expositions shaped the American experience and world view. Visitors to the fairs were not only exposed to new ideas and innovations, but also experienced art, architecture, design, music, popular culture and entertainment. Of the seventeen fairs hosted by the United States, two featured works by internationally-renowned, traditional figurative sculptor Marshall M. Fredericks (1908-1998). Fredericks’ works, along with the other pieces of art on display during the fairs, formed a crucial part of a visitor’s fair-going experience.

It is because of Fredericks’s direct connection with both of these World’s Fairs that the Marshall M. Fredericks Sculpture Museum is hosting the Centuries of Progress exhibition during its 2013 exhibition season. This exhibition will allow the Museum’s visitors to further understand the importance and impact of the fairs on our country’s history and culture. Likewise, this exhibition will put into context how national events shaped Fredericks’ life and work therefore enabling the Museum to fulfill its mission to celebrate the artistic legacy of Marshall M. Fredericks.

Dr. Susan J. Bandes, Professor of Art History, Michigan State University, will give a lecture titled “Gone Today, Here Tomorrow: Rediscovering Art and Architecture from the World’s Fairs,” Monday, March 18, at 4:00 p.m. in Rhea Miller Recital Hall. The lecture is free and open to the public.

The exhibition was curated by Teresa R. Snyder, Deputy Director, Hagley Museum and Library, and was organized by the Hagley in Wilmington, DE. The exhibition is traveling nationally under the auspices of Exhibits USA, a national program of Mid-America Arts Alliance.
